Toby the Tiny Triceratops

Toby the tiny triceratops lived in a green jungle valley. The trees were tall, and the grass was soft and bright. Toby had a big heart and a small size. He loved to explore with his friends. But sometimes, being small felt a little tricky.

One day, Toby and his friends found a big pile of colorful fruits. They wanted to eat the tasty treats. But the fruits were way up high in the branches of a tall tree. The other dinosaurs were too big to reach them. They tried stretching their long necks, but it didn't work. Everyone felt sad.

Toby looked up at the tree. He thought hard. "I may be small," he said, "but I can try something different!" His friends watched curiously as Toby scampered to the tree's trunk.

With his tiny legs, Toby could wiggle and squeeze through the thick bushes at the base of the tree. He crawled around until he found a hidden path. It was just big enough for him to climb right up! Toby climbed up the trunk, using his sharp little claws to grip the bark.

When Toby reached the branches, he saw the bright fruits shining like jewels. He picked one and called down to his friends, "Look what I found!" His friends cheered. Toby felt proud and happy.

Toby climbed back down, holding the fruit in his small hands. His friends gathered around, smiling wide. They all shared the juicy fruits together, their laughter filling the valley.

That day, Toby learned that being small was a superpower. He could do things his big friends could not. And in the green jungle valley, Toby the tiny triceratops felt just right—strong, happy, and loved by all.
